It was a case in which the well-known bill of sale figured. The place had borne a bad reputation, and was down in the newspaper scrap book as a resort for men and women of massory character. The license of the place had been revoked by the Beard, and Anthony Comstock had raided the upper rooms and captured the implements of a gambling den.

The application was made by a new man, and the inspector reported that there was exhibited to him a bill of sale from John Doe to Richard Roe for the consideration of $1$, that there was no ambling on the premises, and that the place was not the resort of thieves, prostitutes nor disorderly tersons, and a license was granted.

The witness said that the Inspector had no suthority to go back of the bill of sale, and that idd not appear whether Richard Roe was related in any way to John Doe or not. They then robbed him of his money and valuables.

As he showed no signs of life the robbers concluded that he was dead, and in order to conceal the crime carried him to the lake and threw him in.

Nester says that the cool water restored him to consciousness, and being a good swimmer he succeeded in regaining the shore. Of subsequent events to the present time Nestlef says his mind is a blank.

There were other narrow and thrilling escapes, and altogether the fire was one which will long be remembered by the people of that neighborhood.

The fire started among the wood-boxes in the cellar, and was discovered by Henry the cellar, and was discovered by Henry Geirsch, the apprentice of Otto Karf, who keeps the drug store on the ground floor.

Eirisch went down into the cellar to draw some syrup from a cask, and the strong smell of smoke led him to investigate. He opened the door into the rear part of the cellar and saw several boxes ablaze.

He ran upstairs crying "Fire!" at the top of his voice, and John Schnell, the driver of a beer-wagon which had stopped in from a company of the store, ran to the nearest box and gave the alarm.
